Alba.Mod - Artificial Lattice Bridge

Architecture.Modular Operational Domain

World

AlbaMod is an endless expanse interconnected network of artificial worlds. All worlds are connected via impossibly large cables, unexplainable to the human psyche. These cables carry power, memory and life between these isolated world. No person knows who built them, where they start or where they end.

Each world was meant to be linked, districts of a greater plain however they exist as fragments of a greater machine whose original purpose has long since faded. This fragmentation perpetually continues, splitting the districts and life we know now further and further. This has left each world to rot, evolving there own ecosystems.

There is one constant, neon sky's burn above the wastelands, only partially covered by the districts that are affected by a burning smog. Oceans are bleeding and flora decays to a base of silicone.

The cables sing with an angelic hum. Some claim the choir is just interference, others reference the memories the cables carry. No one follows them willingly.

The Nightingales

The nightingales are a group of mercenaries employed by an unnamed organisation that exists somewhere beyond the mapped worlds we know of. "Command" as it is known, never appears in any form. The only evidence of the existence of such employers is an undistinguishable voice on a radio, terminal or via the cables themselves.

No nightingale knows who gives the orders, they only partially know where they are now and where they were before they got to this world. All were previously someone else; a soldier, a criminal, a nobody.

On recruitment each nightingale identity is wiped from all records, existing or not, and is replaced with a designation. Their only purpose is to cleanse the cables, the work nobody wants to do or needs. Work for the dregs. The organisation insists every mission protects humanity. No evidence of humanity has ever been found.

The Cables

Cables are not just transport, it is the living infrastructure to all districts. All cables carry information, energy and biological material with its perpetual song. Creatures emerge from damaged sectors as if the cables themselves produce life. Going into the cables is akin to suicide. Time behaves with no comprehensible pattern in the network. Some return in a time span so short there's no use in measuring it, some return thousands of years later as a myth. Some never return. All we know is the deeper a cable descends, the less reality is a factor.

Luna

The first deployed Nightingale, no one knows if she was dragged into here to chose to brave the depths. Her records where destroyed many moons ago. To the bureaucratic, she doesn't exist. After her uncountable amount of deployments her sense of time has faded with Luna being quoted as saying "my body hasn't changed, nothing worth it has. Time means nothing here". She has watched many civilisations be born through the cables, even more have faded in front of her eyes.

Unlike most Nightingales, Luna doesn't speak all that often. When she does open her mouth the muffled voice behind her mask utters names of places or people that no longer exist. Most see her as cold, vindictive and bitter. But who can blame her, she has simply outlived every meaningful attachment to the point of decay.

Deep beneath her exhaustion lies a single unanswered question that has plagued her for longer than she can remember: if the waves of horrors are endless, why keep going.
